Nursery gyms

Young children learn through movement and play. Action is essential for their healthy development. The Nursery gym provides up-and-down and over-and-under activity as well as varied tactile experience. Its imaginative design fosters budding role play.

For ages 6 to 36 months.

Billy goat's bridge

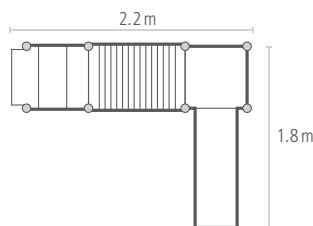

The arched bridge is an adventure in itself. Walk over the bridge or crawl through the tunnel underneath. Of course the view from the top makes little people feel really big!

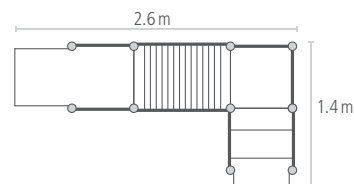

Every slide comes with a gate. This extra gate will close off a ramp or stairs. See the back cover to order.

You can't beat playing outdoors

Children are constantly moving. Movement is how they learn their relation to the surroundings and develop co-ordination of body and brain. Young children develop their balance through all kinds of action, including sliding and bouncing. They have a deep biological drive for such experiences.

Children should spend as much time outdoors as possible. However, when children need to be inside, we must create an indoor landscape that includes some of the action, up-and-down challenges, and tactile variety that the outdoors provides. The Nursery gym offers such a movement environment.

Cosy spaces too

Some people seem surprised that we incorporated cosy spaces in a piece of active-play equipment. Although I'm not a teacher, I am a father. As we worked on the nursery gym design, I often thought of my own young son. When he learned to walk, he was so pleased with himself and was always setting off on exciting expeditions. However he kept looking back at mum or me. It was like his security in our nearness empowered him to explore and investigate. So I realised that toddlers need both adventure and nurture. We hope this nursery gym will foster both.

"Once a baby is mobile he needs above all to be allowed to explore so that he can see the world in a new and different way."
